

POLOSOPHIA

CHAPTER II
QUANTUM ODDITY

“They lived in a kind of an ever-fluid communion. They came and went quietly, and sometimes she could swear that she’d seen the same one of them in several places at once. <...>

There was something about them that imbued the entire lot, as if they all were but facets of the same entity, their differences too subtle for her to grasp.”

Look 1 : Methuselah

“<...> these garments were lavish and effortless, but within a certain structure, and, like their wearers, appeared to transcend the imposed duality of form and function, shifting into one another, forming ever-changing, striking attires that at one angle appeared to be a curly fern of a sleeve, at another – an embellishment of a coral reef, at yet another – a leaf curled into a flap of a skirt or a leg of a trouser. These pieces honoured the shapes of nature’s deep design, and appeared to her just as elegantly resolved.”

Look 2 : Sirius

“They came from the stars – or were somehow related to the stars, or even were stars themselves – she could not quite understand the particulars, Fomalhaut’s account too complex for her to follow in full detail. <...> They generally landed in deep, dark forests like the one she found herself in, for those were the centers of ancient wisdom, and usually connected to the core of the universe through pipelines, or wormholes, if you wish, but they did not like that word.”
